WHEN THE ODDS ARE EVEN

BOB LAMONT sat tall in the saddle, gazing down the hill at Ford City. Slowly, absent-mindedly, Bob reached into an inner pocket, took out a yellowed piece of paper, and deliberately tore it into small bits. These he allowed to fall from his hand and drift off with the wind, until they fell to earth a few feet away.

"I've done right by you now, Dad," he said to himself. "Guess I won't need that paper any longer . . ."

It was Lamont, Senior's will that Bob had destroyed, the will that specified an Eastern college for Bob when he reached the age of eighteen, and law school after that. The will that had made six years of Bob's life an agony, but that he had felt bound to respect.

His father had wanted him to be educated in the East, and, much as Bob hated being away from his beloved West, he had his degree, just as his father had wished. But he still had a problem . . .

"Wonder what use they got for a fancy lawyer in these parts?"

Bob cut short his reverie and rode hard toward Ford City, which had been his home until he had left for college. Waiting there were old friends and new adventures.

The first person Bob met when he rode into town was old Luke Webster, once his father's ranch manager, now the owner of the Lamont place. Bob's family had sold out after he left for the East, and no land ties, just sentiment, attracted Bob here again.

Bob dismounted when he spied Luke.

"Luke! Howdy! Remember me?"

Luke strained his eyes, and a quizzical look crossed his face.

"You look like . . . but I must be dreaming, stranger."

"You're not dreaming, Luke. I'm Bob Lamont."

"But we thought . . . we thought you'd never come back. Seemed as Ford City was too small for the Lamonts now."

"Nonsense, Luke. I always aimed to come back. And now I'm staying. This is my home, and it always has been. I've been dreaming for the past six years of being Ford City's first lawyer."

Luke's eyes opened wide in amazement. He had forgotten Bob's mission back East. Now he looked at him with new respect.

"A lawyer! Well, Bob, my boy, we sure can use you here."

"Glad to hear that, Luke. How have you been, and your family?"

"Family's fine. Just like you remember them, Bob. The missus, and Peggy. You ought to see Peggy now. Twenty years old, and the prettiest girl in the county, I'll wager . . ."

"How about you, Luke?" Bob interrupted. "How have you been getting along, and how's the ranch?"

"Didn't want to have to tell you about that, Bob. I got the ranch into some trouble lately, and I'm afraid I won't own it much longer."

Bob looked puzzled, and Luke continued.

". . . this here new banker, Jackson, has his eyes on it, and he got me to mortgage the place last year when we had the cattle blight. Now he's foreclosing, and there's some trigger boys helping him rush me out . . ."

"Luke, I think you're my first client! Let's ride out to the ranch and look over that mortgage."

Luke's face registered doubt that Bob Lamont could help him in his battle against Jackson, the wealthy banker.

Bob was overcome with emotion as the two men rode together. Every stick along the path seemed familiar and yet new. This was the country that Bob had loved since childhood and which was denied him for so long. And there in the distance was the old Lamont ranch, the home where Bob had grown up. In his heart there was a new resolve, a resolve that Luke Webster should not lose this land he had bought so fairly from the Lamont family.

Luke had not exaggerated in describing Peggy. She was every bit as lovely as Luke had said. "Prettiest girl in the county!" Bob wondered, as his heart leapt at the first glimpse of her fresh beauty, if there could be a prettier girl in the entire state.

Luke brought out the mortgage. Bob sat down with him and started to study the paper. His face was grim! This was no ordinary client. This was Luke Webster, and Peggy Webster . . . and the land was the Lamont ranch.

Finally, as all eyes focused hard on his face, Bob looked up, smiled, and announced, "Luke, you may own this ranch a lot longer than you expect."

"If you can help us, Bob, everything I have is yours," Luke said modestly, his head low.

"We'll talk fee later, Luke. Now tell me about those trigger boys you mentioned."

Luke told about Slim Jennings and Duke Trent, Jackson's hired bullies, who had threatened to move the Websters out by force, if they wouldn't go any other way.

". . . worst part of it, Bob, is he has them sworn as deputies, so he can make it look like a legal foreclosure."

"Luke, first thing they taught me in school is how the law can be helped out a little by making the odds even. Got any guns?"

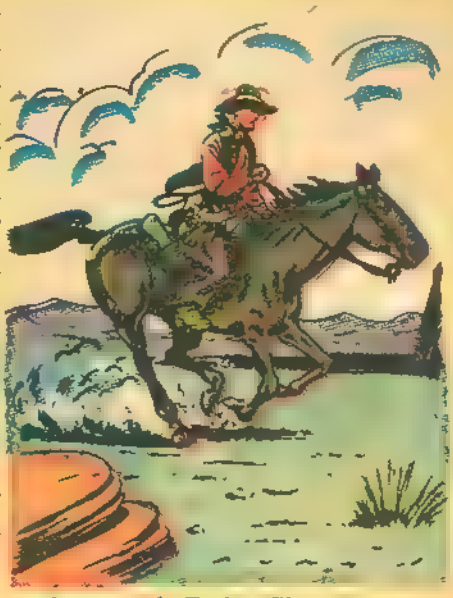
Luke's eyebrows went up with curiosity and surprise. But he was past questioning Bob. He brought some guns, and even sent his foreman to collect a few friends to help out if necessary. Peggy came up to Bob and whispered to him.

"You'll never know how you've helped us, even if you don't succeed. Tonight's the first time in months I've seen Dad smile . . ."

Bob took her hand. "The Websters deserve everything I can ever do for them."

A look of understanding passed between the two. Again Bob's heart sang, as he wondered if he would have a chance for her affections.

It wasn't long before Jennings and Duke Trent came riding out, again to threaten the Websters. This time, the women were sent out of the house, and Bob, Luke, and the three friends met them.



"The Websters aren't moving. The mortgage isn't legal, and no one's going to foreclose it. Luke Webtser now has a lawyer . . ."

Trent drew a six-shooter and announced menacingly, "Law or no law, they're moving, tonight, Jackson's orders, and Jackson's orders get obeyed, or else . . ."

Bob reached for his gun, knowing what it would mean. Sure enough, a shot rang out, and the bullet whizzed in Bob's direction. But Bob had hit the floor, safe for a moment! A first shot was all he wanted. A sign of battle made it legal to fire in self-protection.

"Bob, you hurt?" Luke shouted.

"No, I ducked. But someone is going to get hurt!"

With those words, Bob fired twice at Trent. One of the other men crashed a chair down on the head of Jennings from behind. Jennings reached for his gun, turned and was about to fire when a crashing fist—trained at an Eastern college—connected with the Jennings jaw, and Slim went down in a heap.

One of the men rode off for the sheriff. He cleared Bob and the others of any guilt, and after reading the mortgage he sent a posse to arrest Jackson, the banker. A firm handclasp between Luke and Bob told both men that words weren't needed to express what they felt.

Later that evening, on the veranda, Bob spoke to Peggy Webster.

"Tonight's the first time I was glad Dad made me go to law school. I've a feeling it's a great beginning for both of us."

And, at the door to the ranch house, Luke said to his wife:

"I sure would like to see a Lamont inherit this ranch back some day . . . and Bob would make a fine, a mighty fine husband for Peggy."
